Shooting exterior scenes in winter to make them appear as if they're set in warm summer or spring requires a combination of careful planning, creative techniques, and post-production magic. Here are some key strategies used in the film and advertising industries to achieve this effect:

- Location Selection: Choose locations that are less likely to have visible signs of winter. Avoid areas with snow or bare trees. Look for evergreen landscapes or urban settings where seasonal changes are less noticeable.
- Lighting: The quality of light is different in winter, often being harsher and more direct. Use lighting equipment to mimic the softer, warmer light of summer.
- Wardrobe and Props: Dress actors in summer clothing. This might require heated tents or indoor areas where they can stay warm between takes. Use props that are associated with summer, like sunglasses, picnic items, or outdoor sports equipment.
- Artificial Greenery: If trees and plants are leafless, use artificial greenery to create the illusion of lush summer foliage. This can include adding fake leaves to trees or using potted plants that are in full bloom.
- Color Grading in Post-Production: Adjust the colors in post-production to make them warmer and more vibrant, which is characteristic of summer. This can involve enhancing greens, adding a sun-kissed look, or adjusting the overall color temperature.
- Digital Effects: In some cases, digital effects can be used to add summer elements like leaves on trees, a sun in the sky, or even digitally altering the landscape to look more summery.
- Timing: Shoot during the warmest part of the day when the light is most similar to summer conditions.
- Acting and Direction: Direct actors to behave as if it's warm. This includes how they interact with the environment and each other, avoiding visible shivering or behaviors associated with cold weather.
- Sound Design: Use sound design in post-production to add summer-specific sounds like birds chirping, leaves rustling, or distant lawnmowers, which can greatly enhance the summer atmosphere.

Remember, the key is to create a convincing illusion that aligns with the audience's expectations of what summer looks and feels like, even if the actual conditions are quite different.
